Senior Ariane Galy attended school in France until she was in fourth or fifth grade. She then moved to Brookline to attend an international, bilingual school in Cambridge. She started BHS as a sophomore. "I really wanted to be in an American high school," she said.

Galy's experience at her bilingual school helped with the transition because she didn't have to struggle with a language barrier.

When Galy moved here she noticed a difference in the speed of people's lifestyles. "In America everything is one after another. It's just too much at some points," said Galy. "In France the days seem to last longer, and you have time for everything." Galy enjoyed the hour and a half for lunch in France. The cafeterias were more like restaurants, with round tables and real plates and silverware. When she started at BHS she had to adjust to the half hour lunch scramble.

Another difference between Brookline and France is gym class. Galy said that in France gym is like boot camp. Instead of playing soccer to have fun, students played soccer to learn how to play well, she said.

Though Galy had to take some classes that included material that she had already learned, she liked the freedom to choose classes and the variety of class choices. "In my old school it depended on what [career] path you wanted to follow. For someone like me who isn't really sure...it was fun to be able to experiment."

Though miles apart, Galy did notice some similarities between schools in the two countries "You don't learn exactly the same things at the same time," she said. "But in the end you do learn the same way."

Junior Judith Rapaport moved to Brookline from Israel this year because of her dad's new job. Rapaport plans to graduate and then go back to Israel to be in the army for two years. The army is mandatory only for people living in Israel, but Rapaport is choosing to be in the army anyway.

"It wouldn't seem right not to do it because it's such a big part of reality there," she said.

At Rapaport's old school, many students didn't respect teachers. Teachers didn't enforce rules as much in Israel and the school day was less rigorous.

"Here you learn how to study, while over there you have to deal with the study material alone," said Rapaport.

Rapaport has enjoyed the variety of classes here. "Every person has a totally different schedule," she said. "You can pick really different classes."

However, Rapaport misses the unified atmosphere in Israel. "That atmosphere is not present anywhere else in the world because it's such a small country and we all have to deal with the same problems," Rapaport said. "I miss my old school a lot because all of the people that are close to me are there. It's tough to see life going on without you."

International student adviser Betsy Davis held orientations for international students, which helped Rapaport to adjust.

"You get a feeling that you're in good hands," Rapaport said. "Compared to what I've heard about other American high schools, [BHS] has a really open and friendly atmosphere. You always feel there's someone to help you."

Seble Alemu used to attend a school in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, where she sat with 50 students in one room and learned directly from a textbook. Her school had no library, no free blocks, T-blocks or X-blocks.

There were no sports, clubs or after school meetings with teachers. The only activity was tutoring, if one's family could afford it, which allowed a group of 10 students to work more closely with a teacher.

"In class you can raise your hand and ask a question, but there're 50 students," said Alemu. "It's a tiny room, and only one teacher. They try their best, but you teach yourself,"

Alemu came to the United States to receive a better education. The biggest difference for her is the large number of opportunities that BHS offers.

"You can choose which level of class you take. You learn something and then you see what you learned in labs, but in Ethiopia, no," said Alemu.

When she came to the United States, she had to adjust to applying what she learned to the real world and thinking about it practically. Another opportunity was the chance to make friends.

"In Ethiopia, you are stuck in one room, the teacher comes and we don't go out and try to socialize. We go out for lunch, and maybe a 15-minute break, but we don't stay afterschool. We don't socialize with people a lot," Alemu said.

She got about the same amount of homework in Ethiopia, but it was more manageable without after school activites.

Alemu misses Ethiopia and hopes that someday she will be able to return to live and work there.

When senior Iris Chan attended middle school in China, everyone had to wear a school uniform. The girls' skirts had to cover their knees and students could wear only black or white shoes. Makeup and piercings were strictly prohibited.

The students had little freedom and no free blocks. "I did not get to choose the classes I wanted to take," said Chan. "Being able to pick classes here is such a privilege."

Chan's school kept the students in one classroom for the entire day except during health and fitness class. "Because all 40 students stay in one classroom the entire day every day, it is really impossible to skip classes," said Chan.

The school's cafeteria was too small for everyone to fit in, so during the hour and a half lunch break, everyone ate in restaurants. There were also two 20 minute breaks between classes. Students studied 11 subjects per year, including Domestic Economy, Information Technology, English, Art and Music. Additionally, each student had to clean an area of the classroom, and the two class monitors, a boy and a girl, made sure the jobs were done.

Once a year, there was a required athletic competition. The school was divided into four teams to compete in various sports. "There are different clubs such as badminton, volleyball, basketball...I joined the badminton club," said Chan.

Chan came to the US because her parents wanted her to receive a better education and to have more opportunities to go to a good college. She said that many students in Hong Kong have lower chances of getting into universities. "Though I've adjusted to a new school, I still miss being in China because most of my family members and friends are still there," said Chan.

She handed them back. I realized, then, that she would have to go out in the snow with bare hands now. The fluorescent lights were making my head hurt, and the conductor's voice was completely unintelligible. I didn't know what to do.

Alice stood up. She moved like a deer. It was one of the things I would miss most about her, I was sure. "You want me to get off here, don't you?" she said.

"Sometimes," I said, trying to refrain from delivering the line like Humphrey Bogart, "you have to get off where you want to get off."

She laughed. Now that we weren't together, it was ok for her to laugh. Neither of us said anything about how cold it was going to be outside, though the snow was driving itself more forcefully than ever against the train. Tomorrow morning would bring a perfect winter landscape, in all probability, but tonight was so dark.

"Well," Alice said at last, "I liked being with you."

"Me too," I said, somewhat sincerely. "Goodbye."

She brushed past a wrinkled man reading a newspaper and got off the train. The door slid shut. She caught her foot on the curb and tripped. I tried not to see her white hand against the white snow. She looked up and smiled, a beautiful apologetic smile. "I'm so clumsy."

The train pulled away. I watched the snow fall slowly down, trying to unfreeze Alice's smile from my mind.

WELCOME TO AMERICA

DAVID YASINOVSKY

Plastic glasses full of cheap champagne clinked hollowly, mimicking the sophisticated chink which accompanied the union of two real, crystal champagne flutes that resonated down the street from a penthouse apartment. New York, New Year's Eve, 1978: a magical evening, one destined to repeat itself just as it had for centuries before.

Four twenty year-old kids stumbled drunkenly from the reception hall of one of the cheaper Manhattan hotels and piled into a recently refurbished black Ford Mustang. As the engine roared the car lurched and set off down the street. Snow billowed all around, and they had no way of seeing the police car lined up at the street corner. An enormous black policeman appeared out of the snow directly in front of the car and stretched out a gigantic open palm. The driver slammed the brakes, and the car came to a screeching halt inches from the barrier separating the policeman from the front bumper. The policeman stepped from behind the midline barrier and slowly approached it.

Inside the car, Vadim kicked himself silently for allowing Genna to drive the Mustang instead of walking the four blocks from the apartment they shared. Genna had wanted to impress the two ladies, their dates to the party. Unlike his friend, Genna was too affected by the vodka and his testosterone to realize he was screwed. He was saying to the girls in slurred, drunken Russian; "Hold on, I'll take care of this," as he opened the door right into the policeman's face.

The policeman reached for his gun when a lanky figure wearing a fake fur coat stepped out but relaxed immediately when it fell on its face. It was just another drunk kid who thought he ruled the world. He had been dealing with kids like this all night and decided this time to teach him a lesson once and for all. As the kid stood up the police¬man politely came up and asked for his license and registration. The kid muttered something in a language unknown to him, probably German, and a trembling hand reached out of the car and handed the policeman the owner's manual and a credit card. Trying to suppress the smile creeping onto his face, the policeman asked the kid to touch his nose.

Vadim watched Genna put his hands out like he was supposed to, but what happened next he could not have expected. Genna slowly and deliberately reached with his right hand, and touched the policeman's nose. Vadim knew they were fucked. Yet he could not control himself and burst into hysteric laughter, pounding the dashboard. The girls let out a few giggles despite being scared shitless. The policeman couldn't believe his eyes. How drunk was this kid?

Coming to the other side of the car, the policeman tapped the window, and it rolled down. The face froze in the middle of hysterical laughter and stared back at him.

Claire Chin

"You live faraway?" he asked. The face shook side to side. "Good." The policeman crossed back over to the driver's side of the car and took out its keys. He put the car in neutral and told the terrified kid in the passenger seat to get behind the wheel. Then he led the stumbling pimp over to the back of the car and said, "Push."

When they got the car in front of their apartment building, Vadim and Genna no longer had any alcohol left in their system. Under the watchful eye of the policeman, Genna pushed the car around the block, slipping and sliding on the ice. When they finally arrived, Genna still had the audacity to tell the girls to go upstairs and wait for them to park.

They slaved for hours trying to push the car into a parking space on the steep hill. The policeman sat in his patrol car and laughed hysterically while watching. Once the car was in, he tossed them the keys. "What no ticket?" the fur coated one asked.

"No, I think you guys will remem¬ber this one for a while," chuckled the policeman.

By the time they returned to their small apartment, neither Vadim nor Genna had enough strength left to attend to the girls. The girls, however, left with their belongings and, in true Russian style, some of theirs.

Despite the urge to throw up, Vadim was still smiling. Turning to Genna, he half-hummed through cracked lips, "Happy New Year!"

Mason investigates parking problems

By Emma Murphy
Writing Editor

Every other morning, Assistant Headmaster Hal Mason walks around the school grounds looking to see if any cars are illegally parked in spots reserved for teachers. This is a result of ongoing problem of teachers struggling to find parking spots around school.

While rumors float around that teachers are losing their spots to students and commuters taking the train, Mason said he sees very little of that. The real cause is a lack of spots.

"Due to construction in the UA Building, there's a temporary construction area, so we've lost about a dozen spots. That has impacted everybody," Mason said.

The solution seems obvious: get more spots. But, it's easier said than done. Mason will be working alongside a few others (who are yet to be determined) to prepare to go before the Board of Transportation. Their aim is to secure more spots for school faculty. The decision must then be voted on and passed through a series of regulations.

One element that adds to the problem is that the school is surrounded by homes. Spots on the streets must be reserved for homeowners who park their cars on the streets around the high school. As a result, the school can only have a certain number of spots on each street.

Mason said, "The history of it goes back to when the renovations in the building were done, and at that time they made an agreement with the neighborhood that this is where they'd have parking and exactly how much parking there would be." Mason said teachers are only given some spots on each street because the residents of each street get stickers that allow them to park on the street too.

With the number of teachers, subs, staff members and interns driving to the school each day, parking spots can be hard to come

On the afternoon of Nov. 16, teachers from the town of Brookline marched from Brookline High School to Town Hall toting a fake $15 million check as part of the ongoing negotiations surrounding teachers health care benefits. The march culminated in a demonstration at Town Hall, during which teachers presented the check to town officials in an effort to reach an agreement surrounding a potential change in the teachers' health care plan. The change is centered around cutting costs.

Food theft brought to light

By Nate Brown
Co-Editor-in-Chief

This year there has been an increase in students stealing food from the cafeteria, according to cafeteria manager Teresa Vidette.

The cause of this trend, according to Vidette, is the increasingly long lines for food during lunch.

"We are sorry for the delays that have been happening and we are trying our best to get the lines to move more quickly," Vidette said.

According to Vidette, the cafeteria has been under-staffed since the beginning of this year, due to injuries and the retirement of several staff members. She added that whenever one of the eight K-8 schools is short a staff member, the high school cafeteria is responsible for accommodating the staff deficiency.

This means that BHS cafeteria staff members often spend time working at the K-8 schools, leaving the high school cafeteria with a staffing shortage.

She said that the lack of staff means that the cafeteria is not able to operate all four cash registers, which, in turn, produces longer lines.

Students, too, seem to realize that the connection between the length of lines and opportunity to steal.

"During lunch there are so many people crowded in there that they can just pick their food up, put it somewhere and walk out. It's too hectic," said senior Maya Morgenstern.

Sophomore Sophia Sbi said, "I've definitely witnessed stealing; I've seen kids eat in line and put Vitamin Waters into their backpacks."

Vidette said that the cafeteria sales average 700 to 800 lunches each day. She said that students will often combine food from the equivalent of two meals and try to pass it off as one.

"They'll be waiting in line, they'll eat their pizza, throw the plate in the trash and walk out and say 'I don't have anything.' Or they'll be waiting in line drinking their drinks," she said.

According to Vidette, students will also steal portions of specialty items and leave half-empty food containers behind. For example, Vidette cited the trend of students taking chicken tenders out of containers of chicken tenders and French fries, and leaving the French fries behind.

Students will also disguise two slices of pizza as one slice, so as to reduce the amount of food they are charged for.

Theft from the school cafeteria continues to be a cause for concern among staff members.

Assistant headmaster Hal Mason said, "Usually theft happens when there's the opportunity, so you want to set things up so there isn't any opportunity."

Mason was the mastermind behind recent efforts to decrease the length and chaotic nature of the lunch lines by regulating the number of students in the serving area.

Mason said that when he first arrived this year, he was shocked by "people reaching their hands into food, cutting the line, jumping around and picking food up and putting it back."

"The cutting of the line really bothered me; if our efforts to decrease that have helped decrease the amount of stealing, then that's great," he said.

According to Vidette, there is a misunderstanding surrounding the Free and Reduced Meals program, which provides government reimbursement for lunches to students who qualify based on their family's income.

Students enrolled in this program may be under the impression that because their food is technically free, they are allowed to take their food from the cafeteria and leave without waiting in line.

However, according to Vidette, the cafeteria needs to keep a record of the food sold under this program so as to submit an accurate report.

"At the end of the day, I get all of my reports saying who paid using their account and who paid using the Free and Reduced program, and how much is expected in reimbursement for students enrolled in Free and Reduced,

By Charlotte Hough

This year, the senior history and English elective Good Citizen in a Good Society examined cliques as a part of their membership unit.

According to teacher Mark Wheeler, the membership unit is "looking at who we are based on an earlier unit, which is identity. One is who you are and the second is what are you a member of and where are those lines drawn."

Students first made their own "membership circles" to trace all of the groups that they were a member of personally. Groups started as small as family and got as large as nationality.

As a class, the students discussed membership groups, one of them being friend groups, or cliques. They brainstormed the differed groups that exist at BHS and came up with a large list.

"There were all sorts of groups as standard as athletic teams or kids who are into drama or different clubs," said Wheeler. "But then there were groups defined by something as specific as a table where kids hang out or by one kid's name."

The next part of the unit was for students to do an atypical membership project in which they would spend time with a group that they did not identify with. According to Wheeler, the project had been set outside of the high school in past years.

Wheeler and co-teacher Amy Morrissey thought that this would be tough to start off with, so they decided to set the project at BHS first, thinking the familiar setting would make it easier. Students were assigned to choose a group of friends that they were not a member of, spend an afternoon or two with them and then write about the experience.

For his atypical membership, Senior Kim Winiker spent a morning with a sophomore class in the Opportunity for Change program. Winiker attended an OFC homeroom, which he described as being "basically like any other homeroom in the school."

Winiker said that he chose to spend time at OFC because OFC is a group of kids that he has a lot of judgments against, based on the description of the program and from what his friends had told him since his freshman year.

"I expected it to be a lot of more or less disrespectful students who couldn't succeed in a normal classroom," said Winiker. "I hardly knew anyone in the OFC program. I just had the judgments that I'd made from what people say about the program."

Winiker said that OFC students were friendly to him and didn't seem to mind that he was sitting in on their class.

"It was just like a normal class in the school, except with a little more discipline," said Winiker.

Senior Jamie Rhodes decided to hang out with a clique of senior girls that she had heard rumors about. Rhodes had found some of these rumors hard to believe and wanted to find out the truth for herself.

Of how the group of girls is viewed, Rhodes said, "People think of them as [mean girls], but I do think that you have to provoke them to be [mean]. I think everyone has that kind of boiling point, whether theirs is not as high as everyone else's is another issue."

After spending an evening with the group of girls Rhodes, found that she did get along with them.

"They are a lot more relatable to me than I thought they would be," said Rhodes.

Senior Casandra Arevalo spent time with the Concert Band, attending one of their rehearsals the day before a concert. Arevalo chose the band for her project because she'd never spent time with anyone in the band before. She said that before the project she had associated people in band with the stereotypical "band geek."

Arevalo found that the rehearsal reminded her of one of her ice hockey practices.

"You have the coach, which is like the conductor. She's really loud and crazy and she knew what she was talking about," said Arevalo. "And everyone was just following her lead."

Arevalo expected the band to be like "one big family" but in actuality found that it was cliquey, with people who played the same instrument hanging out with each other during breaks.

Regarding cliques at BHS in general, both Rhodes and Winiker agreed that there is some flexibility.

"I think that unlike the high schools in the movies where people are stuck in one clique and they can't ever associate with anyone else, BHS is pretty open to people sliding back and forth and having friends from multiple groups," said Winiker.

Rhodes agreed, saying that she herself is friends with "a ton of different people." Rhodes added that she thinks BHS is only flexible to a certain extent. Wheeler agreed.

"Ms. Morrissey and I thought that step one would be easier, but it actually did raise a lot of anxiety in my students, which again I think speaks to the fact that there are cliques," said Wheeler. "They aren't rigid, but there are definitely lines drawn."

Rhodes thinks that one of the points of the project was "to reveal how easily misconceptions about certain people can be made."

Wheeler agreed.

"We're always going to be grouped and those [groupings] have real repercussions in people's lives," said Wheeler.

The next part of the atypical membership project will be for students to spend time with an atypical group outside of school. Winiker said that he thinks he wants to possibly do some sort of religious activity that he wouldn't be a part of. Rhodes had a similar idea; she is thinking about going to a Christian Sunday school, something she has never experienced because she is Jewish.

"The idea of preaching in English is a new thing to me," said Rhodes, who is used to services in Herbrew.

The News in Brief

Sewage problems close UA Building

On Jan. 14, a basement pipe in the UA Building became clogged, causing backup within the pipe and a strong odor to be emitted from the pipe. Custodians turned off the water in the UA Building and fixed the problem. Assistant Headmaster Hal Mason closed the building at 10:30 a.m., canceling classes until the problem was resolved. The problem was fixed and the building was reopened at 1 p.m.

TeenLife

On Feb. 7, TeenLife Boston is holding its annual Community Service Fair at the Chestnut Hill Mall. The free event has many non-profit organizations as volunteer options for teens.

FACT OR FICTION?

At one point in time,
BHS had a band with majorettes and twirlers.

FACT! In May of 1941,the leader of the BHS band, Josephine McCarthy, held an audition for aspiring majorettes. The six girls chosen were to twirl the batons and strut before the band on Class Day. For the girls who did not get chosen, McCarthy still taught them all, and if any showed significant improvement, they could join or replace the chosen girls.

College resume building

By Sarah Plovnick
Writing Editor

When I was in fifth grade, my after school activities were probably the first thing on my mind. I rock climbed, played soccer and piano, and, since I wasn't already busy enough, I decided to start playing the French horn.

I was intrigued by the instrument's shiny, swirly tubes, and I had a hunch that anything that looked so cool had to sound pretty cool too.

For the first year I played, I sounded like a sick cow, but eventually my prediction proved to be right. Not only did the instrument sound nice, it also became something that I loved to do.

On a college application, so I've heard, French horn looks very appealing, as does editing for the school newspaper and belonging to a social justice program. I am involved in all three of these activities. I am not involved in these activities because I want them on my college applications.

I am involved in them because I am genuinely interested in them and I enjoy them. When I started these activities, college was the last thing on my mind. Finding things I was interested in and loved was the first.

As I ran a booth at the activities fair this year for my social justice club, the BHS-Emerson Literacy Partnership, I was shocked by how many people asked me if the club looked good on college applications.

Here I was, telling them about elementary school students who struggled to learn English and read because their school lacked a library, and those listening were only considering possible benefits to themselves, instead of what they could do to help.

Maybe helping others wasn't their thing; maybe it didn't interest them. That's fine. Somewhere on the vast Cypress field, jam packed with opportunities, there had to be something to interest each and every person.

But, as I soon learned, some people didn't intend to find their own interests. They were interested in finding something that would make them look better on paper, to whichever college admissions officer happened to pick up their application.

Colleges want to see extracurricular activities on your resume. They want to know that you are engaged, interested in or passionate about something, anything. They want to know that you have interests, and they want to learn something about you from those interests so they can judge if their school is the right one for you.

When you choose activities solely based on what you think colleges want, you are doing yourself a huge injustice. You are denying yourself the opportunity of finding an interest and growing from your experience of taking part in it. You are doing the exact opposite of what colleges want from you.

The point of applying to college is finding a college that is right for you, whatever your interests and personality happen to be. There is a college that matches everyone's interests, from field hockey to videogames, physics to French horn.

So, when you chose your activities based on getting into your college of choice, you are guaranteeing yourself unfulfilling high school and college experiences.

You won't be as engaged or invested in your extracurricular activities during high school, and you may have trouble finding your true passions in college.

When you finally stop worrying about where you're going and start worrying about what you want to do, you don't want to realize that the college that you worked so hard to get into doesn't serve your interests.

Find your interests, find your passions, find your strengths, and then find a college that matches you. Don't change yourself to match a college.

The meaning of Powderpuff

By Vicky Kim
Layout Editor

I have attended Brookline High School for nearly three years now, and I have to ask: what is Powderpuff and what is its purpose? When I hear people talk about it, I imagine girls patting on powder to whiten their cheeks, like out of all those old '50s images. This, I know, obviously isn't what Powderpuff is, so I set myself to the task of discovering what it is and what it represents at our school.

In order to fully understand this strange phenomenon in which juniors and seniors dress up in blue and red, hang posters around the school and hype up the class rivalry, I posed this question: "Why do we have Powderpuff?"

From what I heard from others, Powderpuff serves as a bonding event centered around girls football and school spirit. It comes right before Thanksgiving and gives a nice flow into the holidays. So why, when we are supposed to celebrate a joyful coming together of pilgrims and Native Americans, are we inciting class rivalry? I still don't get it. So, I went to the infinitely wise Google.com. From there, against all of my teachers' robust warnings, I ventured into the land of Wikipedia.

Guess what? I found that a "powder puff" is a "soft material used for application of face powder." So why do we call our girls' football game Powderpuff? I went further.

According to the Merriam-Webster Online Dictionary, powder-puff is a "traditionally male activity or event done or played by women."

Awesome. After all the research, I am still left with girls football. I knew that from the start, so what am I supposed to take away from this?

Perhaps the pep rally had the answers. I've always been slightly overwhelmed by the pep rally. The cheerleading, dancing, chants and general sensory overload that takes over the school in that hour is, in my opinion, rather pointless.

But, maybe that's the point. Maybe there doesn't have to be a meaning in Powderpuff. It's the spirit, the fun and the actual unity that inspires all classes to pour onto the field to watch the game and makes Powderpuff such a big event.

So what did I learn? Sometimes school activities don't have to have a point, they can just be about fun and being together.

The dead zone

Good Citizen class takes a look at the environment

By Aisha Simon and Arianna Friedman
Contributing Writers

THE DEAD ZONE - it's not something out of a Stephen King science fiction novel or from the Verizon Wireless commercials; it's a growing reality that's been under the radar since 1986. As the green movement and global awareness rise, the dead zone issue still remains relatively unpublicized.

A dead zone is an area of hypoxia, of insufficient concentrations of oxygen. Dead zones, embodying their name, are literally zones that cannot support life.

Though there are some natural causes of dead zones, the main cause is humans: common plant fertilizers, sewage runoff and urban land use all lead to eutrophication (an increase in chemical nutrients) and algae blooms, which, in turn, cause dead zones.

Though there are over 400 dead zones around the world, many people don't even know what a dead zone is. Many Americans don't even know that there is one in the Gulf of Mexico.

The dead zone off the coast of Mexico is located at the mouth of the Mississippi River. It's the result of farm fertilizer runoff from the Midwestern United States - the very farms that mass produce brands that are stocked in bulk at supermarkets.

Animal waste, stemming from overpopulated cow slaughterhouses, also flows into the water systems, heavily contributing to the dead zone epidemic.

The dead zone in the Gulf of Mexico ranges in size, depending on the year, and has been recorded to cover 7,000 square miles, which is approximately the size of New Jersey.

So how does this affect us at Brookline High School?

Brookline isn't particularly involved in the fishing business, which would obviously suffer as a result of dead zones, but shouldn't everyone be concerned about the immense reduction of biomass and biodiversity? We humans have single- handedly wiped out over 1,000 species and put hundreds of thousands more on the critically endangered list. In 2006, the West African black rhinoceros disappeared from the face of the planet. We've reduced biodiversity enough; it doesn't seem fair that species must face extinction just because we want to enjoy our hamburgers.

Dead zones are bad news from an economic standpoint as well. The seafood industry relies heavily on the Gulf of Mexico for harvesting shrimp, oysters and commercial fish. If dead zones continue to expand and worsen, fishermen and coastal state economies will be severely impacted. Think about it: no more vacation cruises to Aruba. Legal Seafoods will have even more incentive to raise their prices.

Luckily, dead zones are reversible. We can fix the damage already done and work to prevent future harm by going back to the source. By using fewer fertilizers, farmers can prevent the runoff of excess nutrients that flow into the Gulf of Mexico.

Although we may not be able to directly affect the Midwestern farms, we can certainly make a difference by buying organic products from local farms such as Allendale Farm or Brookwood Community Farm. Yes, organic products and local farms tend to be pricier, but there are still ways to be green without spending too much. Eating locally or organically once a week can make a difference. Educating the public about this unknown phenomenon is one of the most important ways we can combat dead zones.

While spending a week in San Diego at a marine biology program, I didn't encounter a single of drop of rain. It was what local residents referred to as the annual drought: level 2 conditions. Car washes were postponed, shower times were shortened and no one could afford to maintain their front lawn as a green pasture. It was the first time in my life that water felt unattainable, rare and valuable. It was like a scramble for gold.

In the summer of 2009, all irrigation was halted while there was little rainfall. Car washes were strictly limited to the short hours before 10 a.m. and after 6 p.m. The water use from fire hydrants was limited to fire fighting.

Essentially, bottled water, especially in the United States, should not exist. People are often fooled by pictures of glaciers and white tipped mountains of various company advertisements, but that's not where bottled water comes from. They assume that water in a plastic bottle is somehow healthier and cleaner than regular tap water. After extended research and further discussion with a representative from "Think Outside the Bottle" it was clear that tap water was in fact the better choice. Tap water is, on average, regulated fifty times a month by the government, whereas bottled water corporations do not require such supervision and actually regulate less, if at all. Some companies simply pour tap water into different sized bottles and sell what comes out of a faucet (at nearly no cost) for an outrageous $1.29. These corporations have come up with brilliant marketing techniques to sell one of life's most basic necessities to unaware citizens. This is analogous to selling air.

"Essentially, bottled water should not exist."

Students spend their precious money in their lunch accounts buying Dasani, which is bottled water by the Coca Cola company, a company which "steals" water from third world countries that don't have the same clean water at their disposal as we do. But I suppose it is at the disposal of the students. Ultimately, tap water is the true alternative to bottled water, because by buying bottled water, students are taking away their right to water as global citizens and making water a privilege.

GOROFF THE GROUCH

By David Goroff
Managing Editor

I have a vague recollection of watching the snow quietly accumulate on the grass outside my grandparents' house in New York. I must have been about six, which would put the year somewhere at about 1997. When I put it that way, it seems as though it has been forever.

Even then, I was an extraordinarily reserved individual. I learned quickly as a kid that listening more than speaking means you know more about other people than they know about you. To keep my feelings hidden behind a mask or buried deep within just always seemed like the right thing to do.

I always thought to myself, "What good would it do for others to know what I'm thinking?" It could only lead, I once thought, to complication, exasperation and trouble. I suppose a part of it all has to do with fear; a fear that I would tell someone, anyone, how I felt and he or she would think less of me for it.

It wasn't hard to hide in elementary school: I was just one of many children clad in grey shirt, grey sweater, grey tie. I simply blurred in with the other children, kept my mouth shut and became another grey shadow on the snow.

Middle school wasn't as easy. Middle school scholars begin to do something very dangerous for someone who wants to hide under the snow: have intimate friendships. Friends want to talk, to discuss and to share. None of that is easy from behind a mask.

High school made keeping quiet even harder. English papers became questions about what I thought, felt, believed. History papers became position papers and suddenly it was harder to remain a mystery to those around me. But I managed.

However, recently I came to a realization: things don't grow under the snow, and it's hard to get to know, to like, to love, a mask.

As school has gotten harder and my personal life has gotten messier, I realize that having people to talk to, to share with, to confide in, is invaluable. I still keep secrets, but as time has predictably moved forward, I've found myself showing more, letting the snow inevitably melt as things slowly trickle out.

The dreaded senioritis vs. the waiting game

Seniors struggle with slacking or waiting for college

By Bryana Schoen
Photography Manager

When I opened the big white envelope and read "Congratulations!" it was the best feeling in the world.

"Wow, you're so lucky. You don't have to do anything anymore," my friends told me. "It must feel great to be done with school now!"

That's what I've heard from my friends, my peers and my family ever since I found out that I was accepted early decision to my top school.

It feels wonderful to know where I'm going next year and not have to stress about college applications any longer.

Sometimes, I'm afraid that I'm dreaming and eventually I'll wake up and realize I still have to finish my Common Application. But it's finally starting to sink in that this is real: I'm going to college next year, and rumor has it my year is over and I don't have to go to class or do my homework anymore. Hello senioritis, right?

I've lost a lot of my drive to do homework. Suddenly taking notes doesn't seem to matter. If they won't get checked, what's the point? And getting an A on that next test doesn't feel so important.

Of course, the college could withdraw its acceptance if I failed all my classes, but I could slip a long way before I hit that point. Now most seniors are done with applications, and the majority will hear from schools in April.

Throughout third and fourth quarter, senioritis will gradually infect many seniors.

The only person who cares about my grades at this point is me. There's no outside pressure any more, from colleges or from my family; even my teachers don't really expect me to work anymore.

The common belief is that once I was accepted, I could cruise through the rest of my year. Everyone I know expects my grades to drop. Everyone except me.

As a senior, I've stayed up all night, I've developed a coffee addiction and I've fought hard to earn my grades. Am I really going to throw all that away just because I got into college?

I'm not. Getting accepted isn't the end of the road for me. I care about the classes I'm taking this year and the work I'm doing is for me, not for colleges looking at my transcript.

Besides, there's still plenty to do this year: AP tests, my senior paper, midyears and finals, and those grades still count.

Yes, I am exhausted. It has been a long three and a half years and I've worked very hard. Still, there's a huge spectrum between staying up all night and ditching school every day.

That sense of urgency is gone and yes, those notes probably aren't the most important thing in the world, but if I have time, I'll do them. It won't kill me.

When most seniors hear in April, that feeling will be even stronger. What's one more month, right? I want to finish what I started.

In my time at the high school, I've learned a lot, and throughout that time, I have realized that I don't just care about getting good grades for the sake of getting good grades but because I enjoy learning. And for me, reading that acceptance letter hasn't taken that away.

Once December arrives, most of the Early Decision applicants have heard. Then the questions begin:

"Did you hear yet?"

"Have you gotten in?"

"Where are you going?"

College. One word. Seven letters. A senior's dream and a senior's nightmare.

In some cases, where you go to college can determine your future. The first half of senior year is full of essays, applications and deadlines.

The questions are fine the first few times you are asked. They become irritating when you have not heard and you do not have an answer.

Luckily, my applications are done. But do I know where I am going to college? No. Some of my friends have heard. Some of my classmates have heard. I have not heard.

Now I am playing what I like to call The Waiting Game.

This is not a fun game. Unless, of course, your definition of fun is checking your e-mail multiple times a day or rushing home to greet the postman.

It is stressful to say the least. Every quiz, every test, every project, every presentation still counts.

So, yes, I am waiting. I am one of the many seniors playing The Waiting Game. However, I have learned one thing through this process: waiting is good.

Waiting has helped me to not sink into Senior Slump.

It has allowed me to stay focused. When I do get accepted, I will be overjoyed.

They say good things come to those who wait, so let the games begin.

Football triumphs over Newton North

By Sabina Lee
Staff Writer

Watching the Newton North Tigers falling for the tricks of the Brookline Warriors at the 115th annual Thanksgiving football game was the epitome of a Tom and Jerry episode.

Despite having lost to the Tigers five years in a row, the Warriors' relentless defense, the Tigers' staggering 11 penalties and three turnovers resulted in the warriors 18-6 victory.

"They took a lot of cheap shots. They killed themselves with personal fouls, like when they talked back to the [referee]," said sophomore Aidan Fouhy.

On the first drive, Brookline called a double reverse that let co-captain senior Arthur Azatyants throw a 55-yard pass to senior Shaquille Brummitt, down to the 7 yard line. Azatyants tossed an easy 5-yarder to Fouhy for a 6-0 lead just three minutes into the game.

Several drives later, the Tigers' were able to avenge the deficit after intercepting Azatyants deep in Brookline territory. The Newton North quarterback, senior Conor O'Neil, ran one yard to tie it up at 6-6 early in the second quarter.

On the next possession, Brookline ran another double reverse, as Azatyants completed a 27-yard pass to senior Jacob Page for a 12-6 lead.

"Newton North didn't know what we were doing...they had no idea what to do; they didn't know how to line up," Azatyants said.

Late in the game, Brookline had a fourth down deep in Newton North territory. Azatyants delivered the ball to Page for a touchdown with eight minutes to spare. Newton North could not score for the rest of the game and Brookline walked away with the win.

Brookline's victory was made sweeter by the discrepancy between the amount of players. Newton North's team consisted of 70 players while Brookline dressed only 33.

According to the Warriors head coach Laz Mitjans, at least seven Warriors players were injured this season, most of them seniors.

To compensate for the empty field, three freshmen, Ramesses Akamefula, Tyler Cole and Scott Cordner, joined the team.

"[The] three freshmen [helped] give our line some more depth because that's where we got hit by a lot of our injuries," said Fouhy.

Despite curtailing some of the most experienced players from the field, the Warriors were assertive and optimistic in regards to the game. Mitjans always knew that Brookline could beat Newton North.

"I thought our kids felt confident going in [the game] because the last two years we've played so closely with [Newton North]...they felt like they could win," Mitjans said.

On the other hand, Newton North was not expecting much from the 0-10 Warriors.

"They weren't expecting us to come out like we did. They looked at us as a team that they could just roll over. They came in a little cocky," said co-captain senior Irvin Scott said.

Known as the underdogs in football, the Warriors broke their winless streak and finished their season 1-10.

"A lot of the kids quit, but these kids stuck here and they stuck it out as a group, and this is the reward that they get," said Mitjans. "I'm extremely proud of [them]."

It took a team effort to get this win.

"Everybody [played] together and [trusted] each other," Scott said. "It was one of the few times [where] everybody came out and played as a team [and] trusted the guy beside him."

"When you win, the turkey tastes better," Mitjans said, cracking a smile

ImPACT testing is post-concussion test administered to assess measure cognitive ability and extent of head trauma damage.

How to deal with a concussion

By Sam Michaels
Layout Editor

Among the injuries that a high school athlete can suffer, a concussion is one of the hardest to endure, both because of the symptoms and the difficulty of diagnosing how long it will last. A concussion is an injury to the brain that is usually caused by a blow to the head. The effects of a concussion can last for weeks and sometimes months.

Football player senior Byron Jimenez knows all too well the difficulties of having a concussion. Jimenez received a concussion during the Warriors' Sept. 20 game against Weymouth while blocking for quarterback senior Irvin Scott.

All Jimenez remembers from the incident is walking back to the locker room after the game.

"I was told by the trainer to get as much rest as I could. I didn't take any medicine to help the concussion," said Jimenez. "I wanted to get better so that I could play the last game of the season against Newton North."

Following a concussion, an athlete can experience symptoms such as headache, dizziness, confusion, ringing in the ears and nausea.

According to athletic trainer Gina Smith, returning to a sport while you still have any symptoms or effects of a concussion is extremely dangerous.

Jimenez was unable to play in the last game of the season against Newton North, which was also the last game of his career as a Warrior.

"It was really upsetting to not play in my very last game. I would have given up anything to play in that game," said Jimenez.

Although Jimenez was unable to play during most of the games this football season, he still remained an important member of the team.

"I went to practice and every game," said Jimenez. "I tried to support my team as much as I could. Now and then I would give advice to younger players on the team."

The frequency of concussions on sports teams varies from sport to sport. However it is more likely that team members of sports that involve more contact such as football, hockey and wrestling receive concussions than some of the other sports.

According to wrestling coach Mike Carver, about one to two concussions occur on the wrestling team each season. For each concussion case, Carver follows guidelines created by the Athletics Department and the athletic trainers.

In general, an athletic trainer will perform initial testing of strength, sensation, balance, reflexes and memory. In more serious cases, athletes will have to get x-rays taken of their head either through computed tomographic scans (CT) or magnetic resonance images (MRI).

One resource to help identify concussions in athletes is ImPACT testing. ImPACT testing is useful because it gives the trainers a baseline test for a player before they have a concussion, and then in the event that they do suffer a concussion they can get tested again to see how serious the concussion may be.

If a concussion goes untreated, symptoms can continue for weeks or months longer than they would have originally. Athletes can also risk developing permanent symptoms or lowered thinking skills and serious brain damage.

If an athlete gets sufficient rest, they should be able to return to their sport in a matter of weeks, but it is important to remember that each injury is unique and requires a specific treatment plan.

Resilient expressions of spirit

By Tommy Schram
Layout Editor

"Tigers are an endangered species and we are killing all the rest."

This was the saying displayed on shirts worn by the girls swim team last year on the day of their swim meet versus Newton North.

The shirts upset a few of the Newton North swimmers at the meet last year, causing their coach to take to his team's defense. This year as a sign of sportsmanship the team changed the phrase, but that didn't mean the shirts were just thrown out.

"The shirts weren't banned, just not really supported by the athletics department," said girls swimming captain, senior Mickey Wang.

"We kept the shirts because they are a tradition and we like them," said senior Rachel Sege, girls swimming captain.

Much of the swim team's spirit is based off of tradition. For many years they have been known to dress like boys or in all one color for spirit. Once this year the team dressed up like animals and another time they wore goggles throughout the school day.

Despite the implementation of new spirit, it all fits the definition according to Sege.

"[Spirit] is wearing strange clothing, something you wouldn't wear normally, to help you get excited," said Sege.

In past years the girls varsity soccer team experimented with outlandish spirit. This year they have toned it down.

"We weren't really allowed to do crazy spirit," said girls varsity soccer captain, junior Katy Hardt. Unlike most decisions and opinions on spirit that are handed down through the school and the athletic department, this decision was made by the coaching staff and the captains.

Despite their aversion towards crazy spirit, the girls varsity soccer team still wore their jerseys, matching t-shirts, warm-ups and practice jerseys to school.

"Wearing [jerseys, t-shirts and practice jerseys] avoided controversy but still allowed us to have something that unified us and got us to focus on the games," Hardt said.

In the past there was a trend of restriction by the administration.

Field hockey captain senior Kerry Knott said, "I think [the school] should encourage team spirit. Sometimes our high school isn't very spirited. Most high schools have a homecoming or a spirit week and we don't."

Knott thinks that more teams should join in on the fun.

"If more teams did spirit it wouldn't be a big deal or it wouldn't get shot down immediately if a team did something cool," Knott said.

If teams are given full reign on spirit, then it may be possible that spirit could reach its goal.

Sege and Wang loosely define the goals of spirit as a combination of team bonding, awareness and excitement.

"[Spirit] doesn't get everybody to come to the meets, but it achieves the goal of having a more bonded team," Sege said.

Hardt felt the same way about spirit creating better chemistry.

"Spirit is something that keeps us together," Hardt said.

"During the day, if you see people on your team and they are wearing the same thing, it makes you stand out and makes people feel included and part of the team," said Hardt.

Most people participate because it gets everyone excited.

"When you are walking through the halls and you see another girl wearing spirit, it's pretty cool because you know they are really into it too," Sege said.

Although spirit can be silly and goofy, it doesn't take away from the concentration of the team.

"When we hit the water, that is when we get serious," said Wang.

Tommy Schram can be contacted at tschram.sagamore@gmail.com.

Last year, administrators frowned upon various forms of team spirit. Certain forms of spirit have even been banned. This year, teams have not stopped coming up with original ideas. Whether it is team t-shirts, fake facial hair or dragon tattoos, teams keep showing their pride because they feel that it will help them win.

Crew practice controversy

By Anita Knopov
Contributing Writer

A proposal that the girls crew team practice at the Chestnut Hill Reservoir, a more convenient location than the Charles River where they currently practice, caused slight controversy in the Brookline community.

However, getting an approval was harder then it seemed and the proposal fell through.

The proposal was to hold practices for 5 doubles on the reservoir, practices which would focus on improving technique. Girls crew captain senior Julia Randle was intrigued by the idea.

"I thought it was a very good idea and that it would be very helpful for the growth and improvement of our team," said Randle.

The crew team wanted to practice at the reservoir because it's been difficult for athletes to get to practice, according to captain senior Taya Beattie. It's possible to take the train, though it's not the preferred method of transportation by the coach.

"Our coach prefers that we don't take it [the train] because it takes too long and is very unreliable," said Beattie.

"Practice starts at 3:20 and everyone should be on time," said captain senior Maya Curtis.

Since taking the train is frowned upon, the athletes have to rely on parent carpools.

"It is hard for some of the parents who work during the day to take time and drive us to practice," Randle said.

Even when athletes do get driven, the drive is a lengthy one. According to Beattie, it takes up to 20 minutes to drive over to the Riverside Boathouse or the public landing docks.

The crew team is now back to practicing at the public boat landing on the Charles River. In the winter, they row in the high school basement, below the main faculty offices in the atrium. At other points in the year, the girls on the team row at the Riverside Rowing Club in Cambridge.

Beattie feels winter training is the most efficient location because it is easy for everyone to get there.

"Winter training is the easiest thing to get to because it is literally in the high school," said Beattie.

The team has accepted the fact that the plan fell through and has moved on.

"It would have been really cool, but sadly it did not work out," said Curtis.

Anita Knopov is a junior at Brookline High School.

Senior mentors introduced

Photos by David Goroff

In addition to leading advisory in sophomore homerooms, senior mentors have held a number of activities this year, including a four square tournament and food drive.

By Neel Mehrotra
Staff Writer

The Senior Mentor program was proposed by social studies teacher Jennifer Martin and SWS English teacher Keira Flynn Carson when they learned that Headmaster Bob Weintraub and a committee of teachers and administrators had decided that sophomores were going to have an advisory program modeled on the freshman advisories.

"Teachers had three junior mentors helping them run freshman advisory, so it seemed a little crazy to say, 'You won't have any mentors but the same amount of kids,'" said Martin.

Martin also said that when freshmen were surveyed, they said that their favorite part of advisory was having the Junior Mentors with them.

Under the new program, two Senior Mentors are assigned to each sophomore homeroom, where they hold activities and help run advisory.

The activities include a four-square tournament, spelling bee and viewing movies with other homerooms.

Senior Mentors also discuss topics such as Interim Progress Reports and the SAT with sophomores on a one-to-one basis or hold general discussions about social issues, such as substance abuse, in their advisories.

Senior Mentor Amodhi Weeresinghe believes that she has a good rapport with the sophomores in her advisory.

"Whenever I saw my Junior Mentors during freshman year, I never knew whether or not I should even say 'hi' to them. But with the sophomores, it's not like that; anywhere they see me they say, 'Hi Amodhi!'"

Weeresinghe believes that her homeroom's near-100 percent attendance rating has to do with the fact that "they know that there are always two people [Senior Mentors] who can help them, who know something about them, who they can always go talk to."

However, sophomores seem to have mixed feelings about the Senior Mentor activities.

Sophomore Bennett Levine says that while many of the activities and assemblies are helpful, a lot of them are a waste of his time.

Despite this, Levine is supportive of the program and said that he relates more to his Senior Mentors than he does to his homeroom teacher.

Sophomore Elena Friedman echoed this sentiment, saying that she relates to her Senior Mentors and finds them easy to talk to. She also finds them to be helpful, since they often inform students about important school related subjects that she would otherwise need to ask other people about.

Both Friedman and another sophomore, Alex Pagounis, said that since they had learned so much from it, they would have no qualms with the Senior Mentor program if it was "a little bit less boring" by having more enjoyable activities.

GSA organizes transgender awareness week

By Bryana Schoen
Photography Manager

In addition to planning transgender awareness week, the GSA also facilitated a demonstration against the Westboro Baptist Church and provided materials to construct signs for the protest on Dec. 1.

The first Transgender Awareness Week at BHS was held from Nov. 16 to 20. The week was centered around the National Transgender Day of Remembrance, which fell on Nov. 20 this year.

In the past, the Gay-Straight Alliance has recognized the Transgender Day of Remembrance, but this was the first time they hosted a whole week of events. Although there were events throughout the week in Boston, hosted by Massachusetts Transgender Political Coalition, most high schools only recognize the Day of Remembrance.

"I would not be surprised if we're the only high school that did a week's worth of stuff," said social studies teacher, Kathryn Leslie.

Junior Marisa Mathison, one of the student leaders of the GSA, pioneered the idea for the week.

"The idea for doing an event about transgender issues sort of started with me," Mathison said. "I wanted to educate people about transgender issues because I think a lot of people at the high school didn't even know what the word transgender means."

Leslie defined transgender as, "Someone who is born a certain biological sex, but in their hearts and their minds, in their full self, feels like the opposite gender."

She added, "Brookline students know a lot about issues that affect gays and lesbians but less about what it means to be transgender...so this year [the GSA] wanted to have something that was longer, that would be more educational."

GSA co-president Ben Chason-Sokol said, "Last year, when we did the duct tape silhouettes... it didn't make people think as much, and I think the whole point of Transgender Awareness Week and Transgender Day of Remembrance is to have people think about what has happened and why."

The events were designed to educate students about what it means to be transgender and about the kinds of issues transgenders face. They included two assemblies and a series of posters around the school with facts about transgenders, the discrimination they face and the stories of transgenders who have been killed in the past year.

The first assembly was with Gunner Scott, the director of the Massachusetts Transgender Political Coalition. In the second, the GSA showed a film called My Secret Self, which was a 20/20 film about the stories of three transgender children.

The film was longer than the block and got cut off at the end, but Chason-Sokol viewed this as something positive.

"The fact that the video cut off in the middle means that people could use their imagination to think, well, what would have happened?" Chason-Sokol said.

Some children, as shown in the My Secret Self video, may start to define themselves as transgendered as young as one to two years old, while others may not realize it until much later in life. The video emphasized that living as a transgender child can be especially difficult because of the traumatic prejudice they face from other children and because of the effect it has on their families. As they grow up, they continue to face prejudice from the rest of society.

"It is still not illegal to discriminate against transgender people," Mathison said.

"In general, transgender people, much more than gays and lesbians, face discrimination on the job market, so [they] will not be hired–and you can technically still be fired for being transgender," said Leslie. In addition, in the past year alone, over 100 people were killed in the United States for being transgender.

"The numbers we have are probably ridiculously low compared to the reality," Leslie added, because many of these crimes can go unreported.

According to Mathison, the week was a success.

"I've heard lots of people talking about it, so I know it made an impact. I heard from at least one person that he had never known about transgender people before the assemblies," said Mathison.

Leslie added, "I'm always really impressed with how mature Brookline High School students are about these issues. People had intelligent, respectful questions for Gunner [Scott]. I think people feel awkward asking questions, or even feel awkward during the seminar itself, and I think people really showed their maturity and showed their respectfulness."

Freshmen encouraged to "Kick Butts"

Students watch as Trevor Meyer of the ASA Action Sports Tour performs stunts. The entire day was organized by Peer Leadership, who worked throughout the summer.

Managing Editor and Staff Writer

Against the early gray sky on Thursday, Sept. 17, crew members of the ASA Entertainment Action Sports tour could be seen on Cypress field setting up a 25-foot half pipe.

The event, Kick Butts Day, was organized by Peer Leadership Adviser Hope Schroy and the entire peer leadership team. Beginning stages of planning commenced in April of last year.

Schroy and her leaders worked hard over the summer in order to organize Kick Butts Day within the first few weeks of school in order to "discourage freshmen from smoking," said Schroy.

Kick Butts Day is a nationally recognized campaign for tobacco free kids. The ASA Action Sports Tour and the XBOX 360 Get Up Tour work together to bring information about the harm of tobacco to different high schools throughout the United States.

In addition to the tour half pipe, free video games and trivia, members of the US Marine Corps set up a chin up bar for the Pull Up Challenge for High School Students.

"It's a really cool way to get information about smoking," said peer leader, Naomi Orenstein.

Dean Diane Lande agreed, "It looks great! People are having fun and getting the message," she said.

The tour's riders include Trevor Meyer and Keith Mcelhinney, BMX riders, inline skater Marc Engelhart and Phil Hajal, a skateboarder.

The ASA and XBOX 360 started their Kick Butts tour in Boston on Sept. 14 and plan on visiting ten different cities through Nov. 20, 2009.

Speaker Keith Mcelhinney stated on his blog directly to the students at Brookline High School,

"I hope you all had a good time today, and I hope you took today's message to heart. Tobacco will ruin your life. If I can get one of you to never smoke, or one of you who currently smokes to quit, then we are winning the battle, one student at a time."

Swine flu returns, anxiety level remains low

By Nathaniel Brown

With the colder days of winter just around the corner, memories of last year's outbreak of H1N1 virus are returning as BHS prepares for another round of swine flu.

The flu season officially started on Oct. 4, according to the Center for Disease Control website. Although that might mean that the number of students falling ill may increase, it doesn't mean that swine flu has actually returned.

"It's not that it necessarily went away, it's just that we're all back at school," said nurse Mary Lynch.

The H1N1 virus was first identified in the United States this past April, with all 50 states reporting cases by mid-June, according to the CDC website.

According to the Brookline Public Health department, there have been over 30 confirmed cases in Brookline, with 500 exclusions from school and summer programs linked to possible cases.

Testing for the virus was halted except in severe cases, as the symptoms of H1N1 are often similar to those of the influenza virus that spreads annually, with H1N1's symptoms more heavily affecting the respiratory system, according to Lynch.

"In terms of the seasonal flu, people get it and there's nothing we can really do in that case. The only difference with H1N1 is that it's targeting a younger population so we're hearing a lot more about it," Lynch said.

Nurse Deirdre London said that H1N1 has affected a largely younger population due to a lack of immunity. Many people who lived through an outbreak of a variant strain of swine flu in the late 1970s may be less likely to be affected by the latest outbreaks, she said.

A vaccine for H1N1, approved by the FDA on Sept. 15, is expected to become available in the coming weeks, according to London. According to the Brookline Public Health department, the distribution of the vaccine will be handled by the CDC and the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. London said that the vaccine will be available in both nasal spray and shot form. Vaccinations will be available at the Brookline Health department.

The news of the virus's spread is a prevalent topic in the media due to recent outbreaks of the virus at a number of universities. The anxiety about "swine," as many call it, at BHS seems to be at a relatively low level.

"I think it has been blown out of proportion. I know people who have gotten swine flu, and it's not as big a deal as people make it out to be. It's like they have a cold and then they come back and they're fine," said sophomore Sophie Wise.

Junior Sarah Jabour added that she thought the media's emphasis on the spread of the virus has played into people's fears of contracting it.

"I don't think it's any more dangerous than any other flu; it's just that it's on the news. I've known people who have had it and are still alive," Jabour said.

Senior Jenna Morgenstern-Gaines, who contracted swine flu this past spring, was out of school for over a week.

She said that she first knew she was sick when she began to feel drowsy and discovered she had a high fever. However, she said she "knew it was coming," as one of her close friends had been diagnosed.

"I was freaked out when my friend called me to tell me that she had it. I just didn't know what to expect. Swine flu had such a big reputation behind it. I think that you hear about the death count, and you're like 'Oh my gosh, am I going to die?' and it's really not a life or death situation," she said.

Morgenstern-Gaines was prescribed TamiFlu, a drug normally prescribed for flu patients that has been found to be effective in H1N1 patients. Her doctor told her that she had a very small possibility of ever getting swine flu again.

"It definitely [stunk] when I had it," said Morgenstern-Gaines. "I think what I had was more intense than what other people had. Some people said that they were sick for a day and then stayed home for a week."

London said that the school isn't necessarily taking extra precautions other than encouraging students and faculty to be aware of the need to stay home if ill.

"It's just important to follow the guidelines. It's important to wash your hands. If you get sick, you need to stay home for at least 24 hours after your fever has gone down," she said.

Morgenstern-Gaines thinks that sports teams should take extra precautions.

"When it starts coming back I think it's not a good idea to share water on sports teams," said Morgenstern-Gaines. "I know that's how it spread on my softball team."

Jabour, Wise and freshman Tyler Campbell all said that they aren't planning on taking any extra precautions to protect themselves.

"I'm not doing much besides using more hand sanitizer," Campbell said.

Revisions: more than a dance performance

PHOTOS BY JAKE WOLF-SOROKIN

Revisions 2010, which took place on Jan. 7 and 8, included a variety of acts including guitar, dancing and singing. The event was hosted by Needs Improvment.

By Jake Wolf-Sorokin
Staff Writer

Students hastily rush onto the brightly lit, wood floored dance studio to begin stretching and warming up. It is the second round of auditions for Revisions 2010, a student variety show that occurred on Jan. 7 and 8.

Originally named Dance Visions, Revisions began six years ago to give student choreographers a chance to display their work. A lack of sufficient interest led to inviting musicians a few years back.

While many musicians are not interested in dance and many dancers are not focused on music, they are bound by the common opportunity to share their talent and work with the community.

While it has been an annual event, interest in performing almost doubled this year, according to Performing Arts Curriculum Coordinator and dance teacher Lynn Modell.

One explanation for this increase in interest could be that performers like the relatively relaxed atmosphere of Revisions.

"It's just a fun thing to do. It's an opportunity to choreograph," said sophomore Anna Hoffee, a member of Cantico, the student dance troupe formerly known as Mosaic.

This increase in interest spurred the creation of the first ever auditions for Revisions.

"We have to discriminate because we need to have a finite program. We don't want to keep people here for three hours," said Modell.

Students, however, seemed unfazed by the auditions. As "it [was] just the dance teachers" the auditions were "pretty chill," said Hoffee.

For the first audition, Modell and fellow producer and dance teacher Christien Polos asked for dances that were a minute long and at the end of each the staff gave feedback to student performers.

At the second audition, "completed dances" were performed and the staff looked for polished pieces.

"We don't go into the studio with people. We're really looking for students to do it on their own," said Modell.

The show contained two acts comprised of dance and musical talent. Modell believes the unique nature of Revisions garnered the increased interest and need for two acts this year.

"It's pretty much the only faculty-produced event for student musicians and dancers," said Modell.

Many of the student musicians performed solo. They performed original music on instruments varying from piano to guitar to saxophone.

Senior Matt Vaughan tried out individually at first but "wasn't very good at guitar."

He took the feedback and put together a group of friends from his musical theory class and performed in a trio with seniors Minhye Kim and Peter Wise.

Hosted by Needs Improvment, the event was a hit as singers, dancers and instrumentalists alike delighted the audience's eyes and ears. This year performances included Cantico, the Testostatones, Note-a-Fy, Perfect Pitch and other performers.

BETCo. subject matter hits close to home

By Emma Murphy
and Max Friedman
Writing Editor and Staff Writer

With drugs a prominent subject in today's society, it should come as no surprise that an experienced group of actors would want to take it on and develop a play with a message about the easy access and use of drugs.

This year's annual Brookline Educational Theater Company (BETCo.) production was scheduled to be performed on Tuesday, Jan. 12. However, the subject matter of the production hit close to home.

"[We were interested] because Adderall is a drug people talk about, but not too many people know the side effects or the dangers of it or why some people choose to use it. We also explored how easy it is to get your hands on it," said drama teacher and director Summer Williams.

BETCo. actor, senior Dan Katz-Zeiger, said, "The characters who take Adderall get it from another girl at their school. The interesting thing is not only how they acquire it, but why they do."

The show emphasizes the dangers, effects, abuse, transactions and benefits of Adderall, which is used to treat people suffering from ADD and ADHD.

Despite the actors' hard work and preparation, the performance was cancelled after a party was broken up by the Brookline Police on Jan. 8.

> "We had a full class discussion about it and we all agreed that this isn't the right time for this show because of its content,"
> -Senior Adi Ganani

In a e-mail sent out to faculty, Williams said, "Due to last weekend's party, unfortunately involving many students, some of whom were BETCo. students, we have decided to cancel this Tuesday [Jan, 12.]'s performance of 'BETCo. Does Adderall.'"

The play features a scene in which students attend a party busted by police where drugs and alcohol are found. Williams and BETCo. cast members alike felt that this was "too close to the bone" to the events of the actual party.

Williams was not alone in the decision to cancel the performance.

"Summer made the decision to cancel the play, but not without talking to us about it. We had a full class discussion about it and we all agreed that this isn't the right time for this show because of its content," said BETCo. performer senior Adi Ganani.

Despite the setback, BETCo. still plans to perform the piece at a later date.

"We still don't know when, and we might make some changes that would help convey our story better, but [there is] no doubt that we will perform this piece," said Ganani.

Improv: a thrilling experience

By Max Doyle
Staff Writer

Most people dread performing in front of a crowd. Whether it's making a presentation in class, singing a song onstage or being in a play, most get a little shaken at the thought of thrusting themselves forward into the spotlight while people scrutinize them from a few feet away.

No matter how much you practice, the feeling of anxiety is constantly present. Imagine how nervous you'd be if you were going onstage with nothing prepared and you had to make people laugh. That may be a nightmare for many, but that's just what the improvisational theatre group Needs Improvment does everyday.

For junior Alex Portenko, the most tense parts of improvisation are also the most exciting.

"I think the best part is the scariest part: being put on the spot to make something out of nothing that people can enjoy watching," said Portenko.

Portenko is not alone in his sentiment. "The best part about improv. is definitely the thrill of it. You have no idea how things are going to happen, and you have to go along for the ride," said junior Sung Jae Park.

Despite the fact that improvisational theater is billed as a completely impromptu theater show, where every scene, character and joke is made up on the spot, the actors who take part in this risk are often not left alone when they head onstage. Much of the scene and game ideas that set the basis for the actual improvisation are based off of random audience suggestions for things like where a scene should take place or what the relationship should be between the characters.

Perhaps the most important feature of improvisation is the great reliance on the partners in the scene and the whole team of actors overall. Without supporting each other during dark spots and building on each other's

A story of siblings within Blood Brothers

Photos by David Goroff

Left: Tommy Corcoran, supported by David Kaim who plays the narrator, performed in Blood Brothers on Thursday, Feb. 4. Right, senior Taya Beattie plays a woman unable to have children of her own and thus adopts Corcoran's character, Eddy. The play was considered by many to be a successful mix of acting, accents and musical excellence.

By David Goroff
Managing Editor

Although they aren't exactly blood brothers, they are blood siblings. Senior Niki Von Krusenstiern, who plays Micky, one of the blood brothers, sings his musical lines to the sound of his sister's music.

Freshman Eliana Von Krusenstiern's violin could be heard throughout the performance occasionally playing soft, long and, at times, dreary notes.

In sharp contrast, her brother Niki Von Krusenstiern spoke quickly and rushed, a reflection of his character, One of the two blood brothers separated at birth by their poor working class mother, played by sophomore Laura Jacobs.

An upper class woman, Mrs. Lyons, played by Taya Beattie, is unable to have children of her own and "buys" the other brother. This brother, Eddy was portrayed by senior Tommy Corcoran.

The play was directed by Nicholas Jacobson-Larson, who came together with musical director Timothy Lillis to create the finished musical.

Written by Willy Russell and set in contemporary Liverpool, the play follows the two blood brothers' living seemingly separate but intertwined lives as they grow older.

The music was played live by a group of students, who asked jokingly asked that they be called the "Band Geeks."

"[The music] is cheesy but fun. The last song is spectacular," said cellist junior Vanessa Castro.

Sophomore Lilly Gaehde, who saw the show on its Thursday night performance, sung its praises, especially the music.

"It really portrayed the emotion in the play really well," Gaehde said.

Eliana Von Krusenstiern, who could be seen throughout the performance mouthing her brother's lines along with him, illuminated one of the difficulties of playing music for a live performance.

"We try to play along to their lines," Eliana Von Krusenstiern said, "but sometimes it's challenging."

"Really, we are going down two completely separate tracks," joked sophomore saxophonist Nate Mullin.

Freshman Lily Waldron, who plays an extremely convincing Linda, the wife of one of the blood brothers, commented on singing and performing with live music.

"We did have to do a couple rehearsals [with the band] to make sure nothing got messed up," she said, unable to conceal a grin.

But the two tracks remained close enough together that the performance was overall quite impressive.

"It was very engaging and easy to follow," said sophomore Hannah Gottlieb.

The end of the musical resulted in the brothers accidentally gunning each other down but the Von Krusenstiern siblings have managed to avoid any sort of ending to their own story.

"It's fun to know someone in [the play], but it's a little weird because Niki kisses a girl in my grade," said Von Krusenstiern. "[But] it's nice because we don't have a lot to do together anymore."

"Our views are really different because our viewpoints are from very different parts of the show. Because he is in it, and I'm playing from the side and watching it," she added.

When asked if she is ever jealous of her brother's place as the male lead, she replied giggling, with a short and simple, "No, not interested."

Baby with the Bathwater: A comical performance

Actors performed Baby with the Bathwater on Jan. 28 and 29 and went on to perform a ten minute scene at the Emerson College High School Festival. The comical play follows the life of a boy named Daisy as he grows up in a dysfunctional family. The play was student directed by senior Rose Mendelsohn. "The show is a critique on parenting and as wacky and fun as it is, it has some interesting subtext I think we can all relate to," said Mendelsohn. The play was a hit with the audience, who laughed hysterically.

Dear Young Men and Women of the Class of 2010 !

The Class of 2010 is a typical BHS graduating class (not a bad thing). Your academic, civic, athletic, and human achievements are impressive. More than 40% of the Class was inducted into the National Honor Society! You experienced the first year of President Barrack Obama, including passage of an historic national health care law. And you experienced a very divisive and partisan political era. You give me hope, however. Through your own relationships, and accomplishments, you reflect President Obama's dream that our diversity be embedded in great unity. You are a very real model for harmony in our increasingly pluralistic world.

We will miss you! I will miss you! You are fun! Please know that Brookline High will always be one of your homes.

Director of Athletics

To The BHS
Class of 2010,

It has been gratifying to watch you compete and learn.
You've given us many exciting and proud moments in the arenas of sport. Now that your Warrior game days are in the past, we hope you'll think on this: Do well to recite the records, do better to recall every score, do best of all to remember the esprit de corps. Cherish the relationships that you've made here. Go on to make more.

Best of Luck,
BHS Athletics

Dear Class of 2010,

As you begin the next important step in your lives, keep the best of Brookline and of Brookline High School with you. When you look back, remember your friends and teachers, and remember the community which helped to raise you. Take the spirit of Brookline with you: the benefits of diversity, of hard work, of endless opportunity, of so many adults looking out for you, of freedom AND responsibility, and of belief in your best self. A community that looks for the best, finds it. Take this with you and replicate it, every chance you get,

Looking back years from now on your times at BHS, you will remember many special times. This amazing school is a product of a terrific town, a caring staff, and Dr. Bob. Yet more than any of those, this place is built by you, the students of BHS. As you move on to wonderful things in life we will remember you as a talented and interesting class who for four years helped to form one of the finest high school communities in our nation.

China Exchange
2009-2010

BROOKLINE HIGH SCHOOL - GAO XIN NO 1 HIGH SCHOOL

Brookline is into its tenth year of cultural and educational exchange with its sister city of Xi'an, China. The program is centered in the high schools – BHS and Xi'an's Gao Xin No 1 High School.

Each fall semester, from September until the end of January, eight students (all tenth graders) and a teacher arrive from China to live and learn in Brookline. Nine homes take in the members of the visiting Gao Xin group. Hosting a student is an unforgettable and invaluable experience for all involved.

In February, around the Chinese New Year, both groups travel to China. Our own BHS students start their adventure in Xi'an. Students are immersed in the language, culture, forging new friendships and widening horizons. Every morning they participate in regular classes. In the afternoon they follow a schedule in Modern Chinese History, Language, Literature and Chinese arts and crafts. The four + months culminate in a trip the group takes to the region of their choice in China.

The program's network of students, teachers, hosts and supporters has grown at a remarkable pace. When a student with family enters this network, they can count on broad support and delight in being part of a deeply moving history between two schools, two cities, two countries!

Gao Xin No 1 High School group:
Ms Zhang Yu (teacher), Yang Dongbo , Qiao Jiazhen, He Xuening, Huang Xin, Ma Yiping, Zhao Chun, Li Zijin, Liu Yishan

BHS group:
Katy Frost (teacher), Annina Hsieh, Jennifer Imber, Aaron Kopelman, Jonah Morgenstern-Gaines, Arjun Mahadevan, Lia Parker-Belfer, Tyeschiea Richards, Sarah Whitcher

In Loving Memory Of...

Louis Lee Prowse

Louis taught me a lot. He taught me that true friendship comes from within us all. I miss him dearly. I wish the best for his family.
Love you Louis

Luis Alvarez

I love him, but I won't miss him because he's right here with us.

Bryan Ueda

Louis Lee Prowse was someone who I always looked to when I had a problem. At any time, for any situation, he was the person to turn to. I remember our last time together on the weekend before school started. I sat down with his family and had dinner. Louis had suggested watching a hilarious movie after we finished. We decided to watch Zoolander, one of Louis's favorite films. Every time I watch it now, it brings back that memory of my best friend. We had been falling asleep on the couch that night, so we decided to go to bed. It ended up that we stayed up talking for many hours. The only thing that we found interesting to talk about at 2 a.m. was our girlfriends. We were both getting text messages from them, our cell phone ringers booming, and we were laughing at the comparison. We struggled to say goodnight to them, but they wanted to keep talking. We both laughed, as our girlfriends got angry in a synchronized fashion. Never wanting to say goodbye, never letting us sleep. Louis, however, was a patient guy, more so than most. He never seemed to let go of the people he loved most, no matter the struggle or the sacrifice. It took Louis maybe another hour after I said goodbye for him to fall asleep without texting his love one last time. That was Louis, the only person in this world who was patient enough to see things differently and live and love life. He was and will always be that friend I'd toss the rugby ball around with at the high school field. The only friend that'd come pick me up to go on a drive with. There are too many things and not enough words to say about this guy. He was wiser than his years. He figured things out in life that philosophers still struggle with. I remember one summer day the two of us were downtown with friends. Walking past a homeless man, Louis, already treating us to Indian food, placed a five dollar bill in the man's cup. He bent down to say, "do me a favor and don't use this to buy booze and get maggot with." To have known Louis, was to have had the chance to be touched by one of the kindest people one could be lucky enough to meet.

Ryan Connor

When I think of Louis Lee Prouse, I immediately go back to my first impressions of him in September of 2008. There was something about his sideways glance, his tilted head and his mischievous smile that I just didn't trust His class was exceptionally quiet and Louis started off that way as well. Their silence put me on edge, and every time I looked at Louis, he was always smiling. I'd ask him what was so funny and he'd reply "what, what?" all shocked and innocent. It wasn't until much later that I realized he was pursuing a student sitting across the room and his smile had nothing to do with anything that I was saying or doing in class.

Throughout the year, I spent a lot of time with Louis in the cafeteria during C-block or after school serving tardy detentions. One afternoon, he and his girlfriend were significantly late to class so they both earned detention. Louis served detention that afternoon and his girlfriend was to serve her detention the next day. During Louis' detention we talked about his life in Australia and the role of the Australian forces at the Battle of Gallipoli and before we knew it an hour went by. He also mentioned that he was concerned about his girlfriend's busy schedule that week and he asked if he could stay another hour and serve her detention for her. I spent two hours with Louis that day and if he hadn't already been endeared to me, he was then.

Over the course of the year the real Louis emerged. Yes, he was mischievous and silly but he was also honest and real. He was always happy and never wanted anyone around him to be sad or upset. Maybe it was having had dealt with so much in his life that made Louis wise beyond his years and so comfortable in his own skin. Whatever it was, Louis knew what was important in life, how to live life each day and let go of the trivial issues. I believe that everyone who knew Louis learned how to live life a little more fully and meaningfully. I may have been Louis' history teacher but Louis taught me.
